Supporters of Britain, France Win Debate

Britain and France were justified in their action in Egypt, it was concluded by members of the Demosthenes Club and their guests after an hour long debate Thursday night.

The subject of the club's first debate in its two-year history was "Resolved that Britain and France were justified in their action in Egypt."

Speaking for the victorious affirmative were Alan Hartwig, John Walker, F. E. Dowdie. David Yule, Dennis Burnip and Henry Seppa spoke for the negative. Chairman for the debate was Kenneth Harris.

The opposition deplored the loss of life and property of the military action that could only be justified if such an action was necessary to prevent a widespread war, which, in their view, it was not.

The result has been, the negative speakers said, that the canal was now almost blocked and the flow of oil to Europe now stopped and Britain and France had suffered damaging blows to their honor and prestige. They insisted that such disputes should be decided in the court of world opinion, the United Nations, and not by force of arms.

The affirmative held that the United Nations had been powerless to act at the time of Col. Nasser's seizure of the canal or to prevent his interference with the affairs of other countries and had the efect of protecting Nasser from retribution for his actions. The partial blockage of the canal and its effect on Europe's economic life, in their view, only served to stress the importance of the fact that the complete control of one country canal should not be under the and the whim of a military dictator who could use it as an instrument of blackmail.

The affirmative speakers pointed out also that Britain and France could not sit idly by while the Communists built up their power in the Middle East with force of arms and propaganda.

The five judges, on the basis of logic argument and presentation, awarded the decision to the affirmative.
