THE CURIOUS HABITS OF A HIPPOPOTAMUS

This Inhabitant of African Lakes,
Tough Formidably Armed, is Easily Frightened—Damages Crops.

Big game hunters in Africa all say that the hippopotamus in many respects is the most curious of animals. This great, apparently unwieldy creature, for instance, is easily frightened or disturbed, and when panic stricken makes a bee line for water, his natural element. On this account hunters and explorers like to keep a bright lookout when following a hippo path through dense reeds or bush, as there is always a chance of one of the animals being on shore, when, if suddenly startled, he will rush headlong toward the water the nearest way in a manner distinctly embarrassing to anyone who happens to be in his path.

Another curious thing about the hippopotamus is the strong dislike they entertain for certain things. A cross old bull hippo, for example, abominates a camp fire in his vicinity at night. One explorer tells that while encamped near a river one night suddenly at about 10 o'clock a well known old hippo that was always found near this particular spot began loudly to voice his objections to the fires. After making a good deal of noise in his pool, he eventually landed and began approaching, grunting all the time and displaying every symptom of rage. A horse and some donkeys in the camp began to show signs of considerable alarm. A few shots fired over the beast's head concerned him not at all, and when he approached within less than twenty paces as a last resource the fires were put out. This had a magical effect. Having, apparently, in his own opinion, duly enforced his authority as guardian of the pool, the great beast turned and went slowly grumbling away, to be seen no more than night.

Still a third extraordinary thing about this animal is that, although he is capable of great damage to cultivated lands, not only by eating the crops, but also by the way he tramples them down and destroys them, the lowest fence—provided it is solid and upright—will stop a hippo. He never attempts to get over an obstacle, and does not push through an impediment which he recognizes as artificial. Native Africans of many tribes are so indolent that they prefer to risk loss of crops rather than take a little trouble, and their so-called fences consist merely of a few thorn bushes or branches laid on the ground, often not touching each other. A few years ago a gentleman owning a farm on the Lomati River suffered considerable annual loss from the local troop of hippos. Although legally free to shoot them if found "in flagrante delicto," he refrained from doing so, and approached the government for relief. A barbed wire fence of three strands, only some three feet high, was constructed, enclosing the part of the farm facing the river. After next harvest the proprietor wrote stating that the hippos had never made the slightest attempt to break through this not very formidable impediment.
