

Council of Foreign Ministers

The curtain has been lifted to a considerable extent on the conflict on principles and policies which took shape during the Council of Foreign Ministers' discussions in London which are ending today.

The disagreement between Russia on the one hand and Britain and the United States on the other concerning the qualifications of the present Rumanian, Bulgarian and Hungarian administrations was already widely known. Later it transpired that there was a discordance of views regarding Italian reparations and regarding the strength of the armed forces which the Balkan satellites should be allowed to maintain. Diplomatic correspondents report that Russia, judging by Molotov's argumentation on the Council, favors a disproportional leniency of treatment for the Balkan satellites whose administrations he recognizes and supports.

In the case of Italy, firstly, Russia is reported to be putting forward a reparation claim which, according to the British-American view, would nullify the assistance to be rendered to Italy by U.N.R.R.A. as agreed by the United Nations including Russia. This attitude on Russia's part contrasts with her reported aversion to bring pressure on Bulgaria to make amends to Greece for the damage caused by Bulgarian occupation. Secondly, the Council of Foreign Ministers agreed that Italian armed forces should be restricted in numbers and fighting power. In the case of the Balkan satellites, Russia is reported to urge that restrictions should not be imposed on their armed Admittedly neither France nor China signed the armistice terms with the Balkan satellites. For that matter the United States was never at war with Finland. Yet all five Foreign Ministers took part in the discussions on Finland, and France and China joined in some Balkan discussions.

Getting Back to Merchandizing

How far the well-cushioned services showered on shoppers before the war by stores will stage a comeback now that peace is here is a question evoking lively discussion. Many stores are determined to revive only those services directly concerned with the sale of merchandise.

While the overburdened shopper cheerfully shouldered many bundles during the war, much better delivery service is slated for a quick return, although it is doubtful that the twice-a-day delivery will be resumed. Canadian department store executives consider that the public could get along readily with one delivery every day.

Gift wrapping is another feature due to return but with a price tag attached, free packaging being done if the item bought is above a certain minimum price.

While services are one big concern, the biggest job facing stores is the sales training of employees. During the war there has been a sad deficiency in this regard.
