Fish First, Settle After

AF WE take a post-mortem look at the fishing tieup, it is difficult to understand why the danger of there being no fishing must be faced year after year. When men are not hauling in their eatch, everyone is the loser. Moral victories are all very well, but they are not negotiable. They do not take would the courtly, witty little old ones in a future general electrical balled the measure as the final the place of money.

In most other inclustries a strike is followed by. an immediate return to work. Eventually the loss of time and output can be made up to some extent. In fishing, as in other occupations where seasonal harvesting is concerned, a season-long strike must continue into the following year and one crop has: been lost beyond recovery.

In these circumstances, it would seem the i policy should be to give the catch priority over the settlement. If a specific price cannot be agreed I upon before the season starts, would it not be wise to have an understanding on the limits within which it will be set and then proceed with the fishing anyway? Later on an impartial body, possibly the court, could decide whether the minimum price agreed upon and paid was sufficient and, if not, what further payment should be made.

Admittedly both sides would have to surrender gleam when I used to call him such a right, the plan would be per cent or more would be sufsome of the authority which they now vest in the knew that I knew what an In its essence the government of the legislation. themselves, but the sacrifice is small compared to the loss of an entire crop. In addition, this policy would eliminate the folly of trying to finalize a contract before anyone can possibly know the volume of the commodity to be bought.

Commercial fishing is an instance in which it a lot of fun on that naval job Near Charlottes is better to act first and talk afterwards.
